

Before the discussion

Q2 English: background, language support and an evidence key for the 45-minute Empire / Echoes enquiry.

This handout includes the complete background, station keys and final assessment guidance. Model responses illustrate reasoning; they are not scripts students must reproduce.

Before you begin

This Q2 English activity asks how imperial history helps explain plural British identities today. Students read short evidence cards, analyse original public language, and write an audience-aware comment in English. Commerce, coercion, resistance, independence, migration and public memory supply relevant contextual knowledge. Territorial extent is a starting point, not a measure of human experience.

There is no single British state of mind. Distinguish a state's institutions and official statements from a population's varied identities, and distinguish both from individual experiences. Students may agree, disagree or qualify the final claim. Award marks for accurate evidence and warranted connections, not political agreement.

The route samples South Asia, the Caribbean and Kenya, with comparisons to Canada and Hong Kong. It cannot represent every colony or community. The wider atlas and territory pages provide a route into further enquiries rather than a claim to completeness.

Teacher reference · Background pre-reading: 15–20 minutes; keep the longer station key beside you when marking. The sample arguments illustrate reasoning; they are not scripts students must reproduce.

What students are working towards

- Read selectively for an accurate claim and a usable, attributed detail; distinguish an original excerpt from an institutional account or editorial summary.
- Analyse how a short quotation presents authority or responsibility: connect language choice, purpose, audience and a plausible effect rather than naming a device alone.
- Explain historical connections concisely in English, including colonised people's agency and differences between legal status, lived belonging and public memory.
- Write a coherent school-magazine comment that develops two historical connections, weighs a complication or evidence limit and reaches a qualified judgement about plural British identities.
- Revise one aspect of evidence, organisation or language; use precise vocabulary and connectors to make relationships and limits intelligible.

Set up the lesson

- Before class, open the six stations and their source links on the school network. Check the external pages are accessible. The atlas and source summaries work locally while the server is running; external websites and their full documents need internet access. The application is not an offline web cache.
- For limited connectivity, print or save the linked readings in advance where permission allows. Students can use the supplied source summaries as their evidence base and identify them explicitly as summaries. Do not ask them to pretend they opened a blocked source. A prepared short source pack is a fair alternative to live browsing.
- Reserve 30 minutes for six short station products and 15 for the final comment, including revision and hand-in. Use the 60-minute wrapper below when the full lesson is available. Discussion is outside the timed 45-minute enquiry.
- Use each task's displayed word guidance: short evidence notes and focused analyses prepare a 120–180-word final comment. Upper limits are ceilings, not targets. Read the indicated passage, record a usable detail and explain its significance; open-ended research is extension work.
- Demonstrate changing the year, opening a territory page, and returning to the rallye. Explain that annual map snapshots and present-day geographic units cannot resolve every historical boundary, exact transfer date, local institution or degree of control.
- Ask each student to use their own browser profile and download their hand-in at the end. A saved browser draft is not a submission to the teacher and can be lost when browsing data is cleared. On shared computers, download first and use the rallye's confirmed reset before another student begins.
- Give a brief content note for enslavement, racial discrimination, colonial violence and partition. Require evidence-based language and never ask students to speak on behalf of a nationality, religion or ancestry. No student needs to disclose family history to complete the task.
- Read the background sections and station keys first. The essential reading list is enough to teach this lesson; the extension reading is for answering further questions, not homework required to finish the rallye.

Place in the Q2 English unit

Primary planning materials: Q2_Englisch_UK_5_Verlaufsplanungen_AUSFUEHRLICH_2026_27.pdf (213 pages), Lehrerhandbuch_Q2_Englisch_UK_2026_27.pdf (129 pages), and UK_Q2_Lehrwerksrecherche_SH_2026_27.pdf (22 pages). The shorter 28-page plans and the three supplied classroom documents are supplementary. These are the teacher's planning materials, not official assessment regulations.

The guide follows the handbook's principle that selected historical knowledge should serve analysis of the present, with careful distinctions between evidence, interpretation and judgement (handbook, PDF pp. 12–13). Its primary competence focus is reading and text/media analysis leading to written production; the follow-up provides a brief speaking opportunity.

Possible placement: consolidate historical anchors before Plan A's memory discussion (detailed plans, PDF pp. 41–43), or connect a contemporary belonging enquiry to Plan B's functional use of background knowledge (PDF pp. 75, 79). This is an adaptation using this app's sources and products, not a reproduction of those lessons.

The route covers one Empire-to-postcolonial-Britain enquiry. It does not replace the full UK unit, the Elizabethan Age strand, or planned listening, viewing, mediation and extended speaking lessons. The primary plans assign distinct competences to those lessons; changing the medium changes the learning opportunity.

One 60-minute lesson

- 0–5 minutes: establish the enquiry and the distinction between original wording and summary. Demonstrate one source card, notebook citation, map return and hand-in. Briefly rehearse outline, analyse and comment; do not pre-teach the model answers.
- 5–50 minutes: run the 45-minute enquiry. Protect the final 15 minutes: 2 to plan, 9 to write, 3 to revise and 1 to export. The first 30 minutes are short station products, including two focused analyses of original wording.
- 50–57 minutes: in pairs, each student defends one connection with a named source; the partner paraphrases it, then asks one question about scope or a counterpoint. Give one evidence-related and one language-related feedback point. This is a short follow-up, not a full speaking assessment.
- 57–60 minutes: students record a specific revision target and name a question to carry into the next class text. If the timetable offers only 45 minutes, orient navigation beforehand and move this discussion/transfer to the next lesson.
- Timing is a planning estimate, not a classroom trial. Use the prepared core cards and indicated passages. Unrestricted web research, all optional comparisons and a first encounter with the interface will require extra time. Adjust support or extend the lesson when needed rather than removing the final judgement.

Transfer to the class materials

- Pathway Advanced 2024: Robert Tombs, In Defence of the British Empire, and Afua Hirsch, The New Black, offer subsequent comparison of argument and perspective; Paul Hawkins, The Bloody British!, supports analysis of irony and stereotypes (material research, PDF p. 7). The app supplies historical evidence for these readings, not their text or conclusions.
- Context 2022: Taking Stock: The Mood in the UK is a dated journalistic representation; Sathnam Sanghera, The Legacy of the Empire, and the Argumentative Writing skills lab provide a natural transfer from this comment to fuller text analysis (material research, PDF p. 11). Do not treat a newspaper mood account as a survey of all British people.
- Green Line: The Voyage of the Empire Windrush is listed as listening, alongside Andrea Levy's Back to My Own Country (material research, PDF p. 9). The app's short written evidence can prepare or consolidate that lesson but does not practise understanding its audio.
- Abi-Box: Changing views of the British Empire, British history: Pride or shame? and the role-play Decolonising the curriculum? can extend evidence into a comparison or discussion. The impact of British colonialism and Empireworld are listed as listening and should retain that mode (material research, PDF p. 14).
- Material titles and formats above are reported by the supplied research, not verified here from every licensed book or platform. Its own evidence/access limits appear on PDF p. 5. Check the school's edition, page numbers, excerpt length, licence and media access before assigning anything. These class-copy links are optional follow-up; no full copyrighted classroom reading is required or reproduced in the app.

English language and feedback

- Outline: select the main relevant information in your own words. Analyse: quote briefly, explain what the choice does in its context, and link the possible effect to the task. Comment: state and develop a reasoned position, consider a complication and conclude for the stated audience.
- Model the chain: “The phrase ... presents ... as For this audience, it may ... because However, it cannot show” An effect is a justified interpretation, not a claim that every reader reacted identically.
- For the school magazine, look for an accessible opening, two connected examples and a clear qualified judgement. Useful language includes “contributed to”, “helps explain”, “in this case”, “although” and “this does not establish”. Avoid deterministic claims about what all British people think.
- Feedback example: “Your Windrush detail supports the link between imperial status and later treatment. Explain that link before the next example. For language, replace ‘everyone’ with a precise group and use ‘although’ to connect legal status and unequal treatment.” Ask the student to make the revision immediately.

Background for the conversation

Read these notes before the lesson; use the station keys when reviewing students' work.

Britain, the UK and identities: establish the vocabulary

England is one country within the UK. Great Britain refers geographically to the island containing England, Scotland and Wales; the United Kingdom also includes Northern Ireland. The state changed during the period studied: the 1707 union created Great Britain, and the 1801 union created the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Do not project today's borders or citizenship categories backwards.

Britishness is not a single ethnicity, opinion or emotional attachment. English, Scottish, Welsh, Northern Irish, Irish, British and other identities can overlap. The 2021 England and Wales census allowed more than one national identity. Its results describe self-identification in those two countries, not attitudes to empire or the whole UK. A changed order of response options also complicates comparisons with 2011.

A useful classroom distinction is between legal membership, felt belonging and an official national story. These may reinforce one another or conflict. A minister's speech supplies evidence of an official position at a particular time; it does not establish what all citizens believe. Treat any claim that empire caused a modern political choice as a hypothesis needing further evidence.

Trade and conquest were intertwined, but empire was not one system

The East India Company began in 1600 as an English trading corporation. Its growth into a territorial power depended on armed force as well as negotiation, alliances and Indian labour. Victories in the mid-eighteenth century and revenue rights in Bengal in 1765 helped link commerce with government. A royal charter did not mean that the Crown directly administered every Company possession.

Follow the mechanism rather than merely listing acquisitions: authority to collect revenue could finance armies and administration, which could enable further expansion. This is an explanatory chain, not proof that all revenue reached Britain, that expansion was inevitable, or that everyone in Britain benefited equally.

A single colour hides constitutional differences. Canada's 1867 confederation established a federal dominion under the Crown; India passed from Company to Crown rule in 1858. Self-government for settler institutions was not the same as equal political power for every inhabitant. Neither label should be confused with immediate, complete independence.

Emancipation needs a history of resistance as well as legislation

Keep three dates apart: 1807 prohibited the British slave trade; the 1833 Slavery Abolition Act came into effect in 1834 across most British colonies; in Jamaica, compulsory apprenticeship continued until 1838. The dates mark different legal changes. Abolition did not itself remove racial hierarchy, economic dependency or colonial rule.

Credit enslaved people's resistance and organising alongside abolitionists, religious networks and parliamentary action. A story centred only on Westminster makes freedom look like a gift. The legislation also compensated slave-owners, not the people who had been enslaved. UCL's work follows those compensation records into British families, institutions and economic life.

The interpretive question is how commemoration selects evidence. It is possible to value abolitionist campaigning while recognising the preceding violence and continuing inequality. Students should explain what an account makes visible and what it leaves out, rather than mechanically replacing a story of pride with a story in which every person held the same responsibility.

Resistance, decolonisation and the limits of a disappearing colour

The 1857 rebellion had military, political, economic and religious causes. Cartridge controversy was a trigger rather than a sufficient explanation. Participation varied: soldiers, rulers and civilians did not share one programme, and some Indian groups supported the Company. The 1858 transfer to Crown rule shows a major constitutional change; it does not show that resistance ended or that rule became consensual.

In 1947 British withdrawal and partition produced independent India and Pakistan. Anti-colonial mobilisation, political negotiation and Britain's changing capacity all belong in the explanation. Punjab and Bengal were divided, with mass displacement and violence. The new borders were announced after the independence ceremonies. A map can show a political change while concealing upheaval in people's lives.

Do not present partition as an automatic consequence of religious difference or reduce responsibility to a single actor. A strong enquiry asks how decisions, institutions, timing and local violence interacted. British official records illuminate decision-making but should be read alongside testimony and South Asian perspectives; administrative language is not the whole experience.

Migration made imperial connections part of life in Britain

The Empire Windrush's 1948 arrival is a landmark, not the beginning of Black presence in Britain or a description of every Caribbean migrant. British subjecthood already linked people in the Caribbean to Britain. The British Nationality Act received assent after the ship's arrival and took effect on 1 January 1949; it created citizenship of the UK and Colonies. Do not say the Act caused that June voyage.

Citizenship and membership of an imperial political community did not guarantee equal treatment in housing, work or public life. Migrants also organised, worked, raised families and shaped culture and institutions. Their histories help explain why British identity can include Caribbean and other inheritances rather than treating them as external additions.

The Windrush scandal gives a documented later connection between past status and state practice. The Williams review examined serious failures affecting people lawfully living in the UK, including failures to understand their history. This is evidence about institutions and policies, not a licence to attribute identical beliefs to every British person. Current legal status cannot be inferred from a historic label alone.

Formal endings did not close every historical question

Kenya became independent in 1963. In June 2013 the UK government acknowledged torture and ill-treatment under colonial administration and expressed regret while announcing a settlement with 5,228 claimants. The £19.9 million sum included costs. The statement maintained the government's denial of legal liability; it was not a settlement of every colonial claim or a general legal finding about the empire.

That statement can support an argument that imperial history still shapes official obligations and public memory. Its wording also reveals the limits of what the government was prepared to acknowledge. Survivors' pursuit of redress is part of the explanation, not a detail to place after the government's action.

Hong Kong's 1997 transfer concerned sovereignty, not the creation of an independent state. The 1984 Joint Declaration is evidence of what the two governments agreed, not a survey of residents' wishes. Use 1997 as a significant endpoint in this atlas, not as proof that every British overseas relationship ended that year.

The Commonwealth's charter describes independent and equal sovereign members. Its ideals are useful evidence of an institutional self-description. They are neither evidence that all members share one identity nor proof that proclaimed equality has always been realised. Historical connections can endure while their political form changes.

Common misconceptions

- “England”, “Great Britain” and “the United Kingdom” are interchangeable. Correct by identifying geography, institutions and the time period before making an argument.
- A coloured territory means uniform, uncontested control. Ask which kind of authority the layer represents, whose institutions continued, and what the map cannot show.
- Abolition happened in one year and was simply given by Britain. Separate trade abolition, emancipation, apprenticeship, resistance and continuing inequality.
- Independence means that previous relationships or inequalities disappeared. Separate sovereignty from migration, language, trade, memory and institutions.
- An official apology, regret or settlement proves everyone agrees. Identify the speaker, precise wording, date, audience and limits of the claim.
- Empire explains every modern British attitude. Require a mechanism and evidence; leave room for other histories and disagreement within and between communities.
- A stronger answer must condemn or celebrate empire more forcefully. Mark the historical reasoning, accuracy and use of evidence, not the emotional intensity.

Station keys

These are possible lines of reasoning. Reward a supported argument, including one that reaches a different conclusion.

1. When trade becomes rule

4 minutes · 5 marks · Aim for 20–35 words; completion range 15–80 words.

Student question

Explain how revenue collection helped the East India Company move from trade towards territorial rule. Use the 1600–1765 change and one source detail to connect money with power.

Explain · A short causal note

Aim for 20–35 words; completion range 15–80 words.

Use the supplied evidence; an extra notebook entry is optional.

- Aim for 20–35 words in your own words. Show how the steps connect, rather than listing dates.

Map reference: british-india, 1765.

What a well-supported answer could say

The Company began as a chartered trader in 1600. Its 1765 revenue rights supplied tax income to finance troops and administration, helping it exercise and extend territorial power.

Look for a causal connection between revenue, finance and governing capacity, not just the phrase “trade made Britain rich”. The two anchors should remain distinct: the 1600 charter authorised trade; the 1765 rights enabled revenue collection. An answer can explain how taxes financed troops or administration without claiming that taxation was the only source of finance. This is a concise causal note, not an essay about every motive for empire.

Evidence to draw on

- National Army Museum · Clive at Plassey, 1757
<https://collection.nam.ac.uk/detail.php?acc=1968-06-269-1>

Other defensible interpretations

- A student may explain the connection through military finance or administrative capacity, provided the mechanism is clear.
- A strong qualification may emphasise Indian intermediaries, contested authority or variation between territories, provided evidence is relevant.

Listen for these misconceptions

- A charter in 1600 gave the Company ownership of India.
- Company rule and direct Crown government were identical.
- Every inhabitant of Britain benefited equally from imperial profits.

Use in discussion

- What would you need to know about taxpayers, soldiers or local officials to test the proposed causal chain?

When reviewing responses

Historical change · 2 marks

Accurately distinguishes the 1600 trading charter from the later revenue rights; one mark for each.

Causal connection · 2 marks

Explains how revenue could finance troops or administration and thus support governing or territorial power; reward the connected mechanism.

Clear English · 1 mark

Communicates the relationship concisely in intelligible own wording, using cause and effect accurately.

2. Who made freedom happen?

5 minutes · 5 marks · Aim for 20–35 words; completion range 20–80 words.

Student question

An invented museum label reads: “Britain gave enslaved people their freedom.” Rewrite it for visitors your age. Include enslaved people’s resistance and one accurate detail about abolition, apprenticeship or compensation.

Rewrite · A museum label for teenage visitors

Aim for 20–35 words; completion range 20–80 words.

At least 1 source saved in the notebook and used in the answer.

- Aim for 20–35 words. Write the replacement label itself, choosing evidence that changes the story of who acted.
- Save at least one source that supports your label; you do not need to add a separate explanation.

Map reference: jamaica, 1838.

What a well-supported answer could say

Enslaved people, including Samuel Sharpe's supporters in Jamaica, resisted slavery. Abolition took effect in 1834, but compulsory apprenticeship continued until 1838, while slave-owners received compensation.

The required product is the replacement museum label for teenage visitors; do not demand a separate explanation. The initial label is an invented teaching example. The student's primary evidence is Cotton's military proclamation of 2 January 1832: it records colonial threats against rebels, not an account in their own voice. Read it alongside Parliament's account. Accept multiple agents and a clear correction: resistance supplies enslaved agency, while apprenticeship or compensation can complicate a gift-of-freedom narrative. Parliament's action can still be recognised. The additional JIS profile helps with Sharpe's organising but its Act passage date is imprecise: corroborate 1833/1834 with Parliament. A 1833 Act taking effect in 1834 is more precise than treating those as competing dates.

Other defensible interpretations

- The revised panel may foreground resistance, the incomplete transition from slavery, compensation to owners, or a combination.
- A student may preserve a place for abolitionist pride while explaining why recognition of slavery and those resisting it is also necessary.

Listen for these misconceptions

- The 1807 Act immediately freed enslaved people in Jamaica.
- Those formerly enslaved received the compensation.
- Jamaica became independent when apprenticeship ended.

Use in discussion

- Whose name, action or experience belongs on a public panel, and which evidence justifies the choice?

When reviewing responses

Agency and historical accuracy · 3 marks

Recognises enslaved people's active resistance, accurately describes a relevant abolition/apprenticeship/compensation detail, and avoids presenting freedom as an uncomplicated gift; one mark for each.

Source evidence · 1 mark

Selects a concrete detail supported by a saved relevant source; a link without a relevant detail is insufficient.

Audience and clarity · 1 mark

Produces a concise, intelligible museum label for teenage readers rather than a separate academic explanation.

3. One colour, unequal power

6 minutes · 5 marks · Aim for 35–50 words; completion range 25–100 words.

Student question

Analyse how one word or short phrase in Victoria's 1858 proclamation presents British rule to people in India. Explain its possible effect or purpose, then state why this promise cannot establish how people were actually treated.

Analyse wording · A note linking language, purpose and evidence

Aim for 35–50 words; completion range 25–100 words.

Use the supplied evidence; an extra notebook entry is optional.

- Aim for 35–50 words. Select exact wording from the authentic quotation, explain what it does, and use the historical context.
- A possible audience effect is an interpretation. Do not assume everyone accepted the promise, or that the promise proves either success or universal failure.

Map reference: british-india, 1858.

What a well-supported answer could say

"Equal and impartial" presents Crown rule as fair and protective. After the uprising, this assurance could seek trust and loyalty among people in India. It establishes the official promise, but evidence of administration and people's experiences is needed to judge whether it was fulfilled.

Link a short phrase from the original wording to a purpose and a plausible audience effect. For example, the promise of equal protection presents Crown rule as fair and reassuring after rebellion. This is an interpretation of the wording, not proof of its success or implementation. The student card reproduces an excerpt from the 1858 proclamation via a later book: His Majesty King George's Speeches in India, Appendix E, PDF p. 178 / printed xviii, held by Tamil Digital Library. The separate British Library catalogue record supplies contextual provenance. Distinguish the original proclamation, its later reproduction and the editorial summary. Canada remains an optional comparison of governmental forms; elected settler government was not universal political equality.

Other defensible interpretations

- Students may request court records, recruitment records, testimony or local administrative records to test the promise.
- A student may argue that the promise later offered a standard against which subjects could criticise rule, while distinguishing that inference from demonstrated practice.

Listen for these misconceptions

- A biased or official source is useless.
- Self-government meant equal rights for Indigenous peoples and all other inhabitants.
- All Indian communities reacted identically to Company rule or the rebellion.

Use in discussion

- What can an unfulfilled promise still tell a historian about an institution and the people it addresses?

When reviewing responses

Precise textual evidence · 1 mark

Selects an exact, relevant word or phrase from the authentic proclamation, not from the editorial summary.

Language and function · 2 marks

Explains how the wording presents rule and connects this to an intended audience, purpose or plausible reader effect; mere device naming is insufficient.

Historical context · 1 mark

Uses the change to Crown rule or the aftermath of the uprising to make the interpretation more specific.

Source limit · 1 mark

Explains that a stated promise does not establish implementation or every person's response.

4. Independence is more than a border

4 minutes · 5 marks · Aim for 20–30 words; completion range 15–80 words.

Student question

Outline what changed politically in 1947 and one human experience surrounding partition that the map cannot show. Use a specific detail from the partition source.

Outline · Two sentences distinguishing a border change from experience

Aim for 20–30 words; completion range 15–80 words.

Use the supplied evidence; an extra notebook entry is optional.

- Aim for 20–30 words in two short sentences. Distinguish the change in government from people's experiences.

Map reference: british-india, 1947.

What a well-supported answer could say

Independent India and Pakistan replaced British rule in 1947. Iqbal's aunt recalls her family's earlier displacement, showing a human experience invisible in the map's colour change.

Require a concise distinction between the 1947 political change and one source-supported human experience; no casualty total or present-day identity link is required at this stop. The archive includes Santokh Singh's letter of 1 June 1946 and, separately, later oral testimony in which Iqbal's aunt recalls earlier family displacement. Do not conflate these sources, date either experience from the map, or redraft the letter as a response written after August 1947. The final comment is where a student may develop a qualified later connection.

<https://www.nationalarchives.gov.uk/education/teaching-resources/indian-independence-part-one/>

Other defensible interpretations

- An answer may use another accurate consequence supported by the supplied card, while keeping the evidence's date and scope clear.
- Students can name displacement or violence without inventing a precise casualty total or a single experience shared by all affected people.

Listen for these misconceptions

- The map shows precise day-by-day borders in August 1947.
- Partition was inevitable because religious communities could never coexist.
- Every South Asian person in Britain has the same migration or partition history.

Use in discussion

- Which matters more for the question you are asking: a constitutional document, a boundary map, or a person's testimony? Explain rather than rank them absolutely.

When reviewing responses

Constitutional change · 1 mark

Identifies the end of British rule and/or the creation of independent India and Pakistan accurately.

Human experience and evidence · 2 marks

Identifies displacement, violence or another supported human experience and gives a source-supported detail; one mark for each. Distinguishes earlier events from consequences of the 1947 partition.

Distinction · 1 mark

Clearly separates political independence from lived experience instead of treating one as a full account of the other.

Precise English · 1 mark

Uses concise, intelligible own wording and accurate references to people, places or events.

5. Who gets to belong?

5 minutes · 5 marks · Aim for 25–40 words; completion range 20–100 words.

Student question

Explain the difference between legal status and accepted belonging using one Windrush detail. Connect the example to Britain's imperial relationship with the Caribbean.

Explain · A short contrast about citizenship and belonging

Aim for 25–40 words; completion range 20–100 words.

At least 1 source saved in the notebook and used in the answer.

- Aim for 25–40 words. Make the contrast clear, for example with a concession or contrasting clause.
- Use and save a relevant source. One person's experience cannot represent everyone's identity or treatment.

What a well-supported answer could say

Caribbean colonial ties meant arrivals could be British subjects, yet this status did not guarantee acceptance. Williams's review documents injustice towards lawful residents, showing how institutions could exclude people whose lives and belonging were already connected to Britain.

Credit a clear separation between legal status and treatment, expressed through an intelligible contrast rather than a compulsory linking word. The connection is not that every migrant had an identical status, but that imperial nationality and later rules created relationships an "unconnected outsider" story misses. Ena Clare Sullivan's nationality registration of 3 December 1968 records her 1948 arrival and later working life; it is not a passenger list or evidence that she experienced the later scandal. The 2020 review answers a different question. Its quoted witness is unnamed on PDF p. 8; do not attribute those words to Sullivan or use them to represent all migrants.

Other defensible interpretations

- An answer can emphasise legal exclusion, social acceptance, cultural contribution or institutional failure, if it gives relevant evidence.
- A student may distinguish citizenship from lawful residence rather than treating them as synonyms. That precision should be rewarded.

Listen for these misconceptions

- The 1948 Act had already taken effect when the Empire Windrush arrived in June.
- Legal residence means every person was a British citizen, or legal citizenship always meant equal treatment.
- Black British history began in 1948.

Use in discussion

- What evidence would establish legal status, and what different evidence would establish felt belonging?

When reviewing responses

Legal status and belonging · 2 marks

Distinguishes a legal entitlement/status from social acceptance or institutional treatment, and explains the difference rather than listing two terms.

Specific source evidence · 1 mark

Uses a relevant, attributable detail from the arrival evidence or Williams review.

Imperial connection · 1 mark

Connects the example accurately with colonial ties or British subjecthood, without crediting June 1948 arrivals to an Act effective in 1949.

Coherent English contrast · 1 mark

Expresses the relationship clearly with appropriate linking or sentence structure; no particular linking word is required.

6. When does an empire end?

6 minutes · 5 marks · Aim for 35–50 words; completion range 25–100 words.

Student question

Analyse the contrast between the expressions of regret and the denial of liability in the 2013 Kenya statement. What position does this wording present, and how does the statement complicate the idea that imperial history ended at independence?

Analyse wording · A source analysis connecting independence with continuing consequences

Aim for 35–50 words; completion range 25–100 words.

At least 1 source saved in the notebook and used in the answer.

- Aim for 35–50 words. Link a precise word or phrase to the government's communicative purpose and a continuing consequence.
- Save the statement. It records an official position in 2013; it cannot establish what all people in Britain think today.

Map reference: kenya, 1963.

What a well-supported answer could say

The expression of regret recognises suffering, while the government denies legal liability for the claims. This presents an acknowledgement of abuse alongside a legal defence. Addressing claimants in 2013 shows that consequences continued after Kenya's independence; it does not reveal every Briton's views.

Analyse the contrast between regret and the denial of liability; a factual summary of the settlement alone is incomplete. The statement acknowledges suffering while maintaining a legal boundary. Claims and the official response continued after independence, but the source cannot measure present public opinion. Do not silently convert an expression of regret into an unlimited apology or admission of legal liability. Hong Kong is an optional comparison of constitutional change, not a second required case at this stop.

- Sino-British Joint Declaration · treaty text, 1984
<https://www.cmab.gov.hk/en/issues/jd2.htm>

Other defensible interpretations

- Students may stress that a settlement can both acknowledge harm and limit institutional responsibility.
- An answer may conclude that political endings matter greatly, while showing that they do not end every memory, claim or connection.

Listen for these misconceptions

- The 2013 statement resolved every claim arising from colonial rule.
- Hong Kong became an independent sovereign state in 1997.
- Every overseas territory and all imperial relationships disappeared in 1997.

Use in discussion

- Which phrases establish the statement's scope, and which additional voices would change or extend the account?

When reviewing responses

Precise textual evidence · 1 mark

Refers precisely to authentic wording expressing regret and/or limiting liability, clearly distinguished from editorial paraphrase.

Language and purpose · 2 marks

Explains the tension between acknowledgement and a legal boundary, and its communicative effect or purpose; reward analysis rather than treating regret as an unlimited admission.

Connection across time · 1 mark

Explains how the post-independence statement, claims or settlement show continuing consequences of colonial rule.

Scope and clarity · 1 mark

Expresses a bounded interpretation of this official position without generalising it to all British opinion or claiming all responsibility was accepted.

The final assessment

The past inside the present

15 minutes · 10 marks · Aim for 120–180 words; completion range 100–240 words.

Student question

Your school magazine asks: “How far does Britain’s imperial past help explain British identities today?” Write a comment for readers your age. Develop two connections between past events and present-day belonging, public memory or ideas about Britain. Use one case about resistance or independence and one about belonging or memory. Consider a complication and explain one limit of your evidence.

Comment · An evidence-based school-magazine comment

- Aim for 120–180 words. Give a clear judgement and explain how each historical example supports it; a list of events is not an argument.
- Identify at least two relevant sources in your comment and save them in your notebook. Judge the value of your examples by their explanatory relevance and whose experiences they represent.
- Write clear paragraphs for readers your age. Treat British identities as plural: experiences and views can differ between and within nations, communities and generations. Supported disagreement can earn full marks.
- During revision, check one past-to-present link for overstatement and improve one sentence for clarity. A complication might be another influence on identity or a source that cannot show present-day opinion.

A possible synthesis

A map cannot tell the whole story of Britain. Imperial history helps explain important, but different, experiences of belonging. In Jamaica, Sharpe’s supporters resisted slavery; Parliament’s account shows that compulsory apprenticeship continued after abolition. Together, these sources challenge a simple national story in which Britain gave freedom. Remembering whose actions mattered can change which experiences a public account recognises. Windrush offers a direct connection to belonging: colonial ties meant Caribbean arrivals could be British subjects, yet legal status did not guarantee fair treatment. Williams’s review documents how lawful residents later suffered injustice. Empire therefore helps explain both connection and exclusion. However, the review cannot tell us how everyone in Britain defines themselves. Region, class and personal experience also matter. We should use imperial history to explain particular relationships and question public stories, while recognising that it is one influence on plural identities rather than a complete explanation.

Read the response as a comment for a school magazine, not a checklist of approved opinions. A well-supported qualification or disagreement can earn full marks. Two historical connections should do explanatory work: one involving resistance or independence and one involving belonging or memory. Naming places is insufficient. A complication or specific source limit should qualify the judgement rather than merely add the word “biased”.

Other defensible judgements

- A defensible partial disagreement might argue that the sources establish particular institutional and community connections but cannot prove that empire is more important than every other influence on identity. It should still explain those connections accurately.
- A defensible agreement might use migration as a direct link and public memory as a contested link, while arguing that present borders are an inadequate measure of either.
- Students may weigh class, religion, regional politics, European relationships or later events as additional influences. These are not escape clauses: explain why they qualify the argument and what evidence would be needed.

Common pitfalls

- There is one national psychology that can be read from the size of the empire.
- A government statement is a public-opinion survey.
- An essay earns marks for agreement with the teacher or for strong moral language alone.

Assessment guidance

Judgement and explanation · 3 marks

States a defensible judgement and develops two historical-to-present connections, one mark for each. Uses relevance or representation to weigh what the cases can explain and considers a complication; do not reward unsupported inevitability.

Purposeful evidence · 2 marks

Uses accurate evidence from two cases, including resistance/independence and belonging/memory, and identifies at least two relevant sources. Credit evidence that advances the argument, not a list of facts or links.

Source scope · 1 mark

Explains a specific source limit and respects plural identities; a single official statement or individual experience is not evidence of everyone's present opinion.

Audience and text type · 2 marks

Produces a focused comment with an accessible position and explanations suited to school-magazine readers; one mark for a recognisable comment, one for effective audience awareness.

Coherence and English · 2 marks

Organises the argument clearly and uses sufficiently precise, intelligible English to connect claim, evidence and qualification; one mark for each. Assess communication, not a quota of advanced vocabulary.

Marking the whole enquiry

- The six station investigations carry 30 marks together; the final response carries 10: 40 local formative marks in total, all assessed by a teacher. This is not an official Abitur mark scheme, examination or grade conversion.

- Award the published analytic criteria, including partial credit. Do not infer quality from word count, spelling alone or the presence of a keyword.
- A high-quality response links evidence to an explanation, qualifies its scope and identifies a specific source limitation. A developing response supplies accurate facts but leaves the connections implicit. Give the next step as a reasoning task.
- Source attribution may use the institution and title or a clear notebook reference. A list of URLs without substantive use does not satisfy evidence criteria. Do not demand formal academic citation style in a timed school task.
- For contextual explanation, accept the labelled summary or a pre-issued equivalent if a link is blocked. For the two tasks analysing language, students need the original wording printed in the source card or an equivalent teacher-issued original excerpt; an editorial summary cannot establish the original speaker's language choices.
- Assess English through the published task criteria: clear task focus, appropriate audience and register, connected reasoning and precise vocabulary. Do not count every grammar error as a separate deduction or let one error remove otherwise demonstrated historical understanding. Give a content/evidence next step and one language next step.
- The application checks completion and word ranges; it does not grade interpretation. Teacher material is openly accessible for classroom use, so treat this as a formative enquiry rather than a secure examination.

- UK Government · Statement on settlement of Mau Mau claims, 6 June 2013
<https://www.gov.uk/government/news/statement-to-parliament-on-settlement-of-mau-mau-claims>

Bring the class back together

- Which station changed your explanation rather than just adding a fact? Identify the evidence responsible.
- Choose one event whose colour on the map barely changes but whose significance for people is enormous. What does that reveal about historical maps?
- Can abolition be a source of pride without erasing enslavement and resistance? What would an honest commemorative text include?
- When are the actions of a state useful evidence about national identity, and when would that inference be too broad?
- What additional evidence would help distinguish imperial inheritance from later choices? Make one researchable question rather than a general opinion.

Support without supplying the answer

- Use this short structure: “The map shows Source [title] adds Together they suggest However, neither tells us”
- Give a small glossary: revenue = income collected by a government; sovereignty = supreme political authority; emancipation = release from slavery; citizenship = legal membership; identity = a person’s or group’s sense of belonging.
- Let pairs discuss one source before each student writes an individual answer. Accept accurate concise prose; do not reward extra words for their own sake.
- For language support, allow a bilingual glossary and a brief plan in the student’s strongest language, then produce the response in English. Recognise historical understanding while teaching the English needed to express it; assess language through the published criteria rather than ignoring it or counting isolated errors.

Extend the enquiry

- Compare an official statement with a survivor’s account, a local museum interpretation or a historian’s analysis. Explain what changes when the viewpoint changes.
- Trace one named institution, place or object in Britain back to an imperial connection. Establish the connection through evidence rather than assuming its name is sufficient.
- Challenge the final claim: which aspects of identity might be better explained by class, religion, domestic constitutional history or later international relationships?
- Investigate a case missing from the route, such as Ireland, Australia or an African territory. Explain whether it strengthens or changes your initial argument.
